Dear Harvey Customer Success team,

I have already been Harvey's customer. As the firm-side lead on an enterprise legal-AI pilot, I onboarded colleagues, integrated tools like Microsoft Copilot and Filevine's Lois into daily work, and drove the deep, daily usage that adoption — and renewal — depends on. I am applying for the Scaled Customer Success Manager role because making legal professionals successful with AI is exactly the work I want to do at scale, for the product I believe is defining the category.

Retention and expansion are won the way I have already worked: by proving value, not just shipping a tool. I ran value-and-adoption reviews with everyone from office managers to partners — the firm-internal version of a QBR — translating capability into concrete workflow ROI. I watched for where usage stalled and intervened early with targeted training and reusable playbooks. And I championed what LLMs can genuinely do while being honest about their limits — the credibility that makes a customer trust your next recommendation.

Let me also name the gap rather than dance around it: I have not yet carried a formal renewals quota or managed a book inside a CS platform. What I bring instead is the half that is harder to teach — deep legal-domain fluency and a real record of driving the adoption that retention rests on. The commercial mechanics I will pick up quickly; the customer empathy and product judgment, I already have.

That foundation is real. For more than a decade I ran a boutique firm end to end — owning client relationships, billing and receivables, and the renew-or-replace decisions across our SaaS stack — so a book of business, health metrics, and revenue conversations are familiar ground. And because I know the legal customer's workflows from the inside, I can be the prescriptive, consultative advisor this role calls for, and turn frontline feedback into clear roadmap signal for Product and Legal Engineering.

Harvey's values land with me — decisiveness, simplicity, and the sense that the job's not finished. I am Chicago-based and glad to work hybrid, close to the team and to customers. I built a portfolio of legal-AI enablement work — onboarding modules, job aids, and a worked chronology evaluation — at ajdonnelly.github.io/harvey-customer-success, and I would welcome the chance to bring that customer-obsessed, domain-deep approach to your Scaled CS team. Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Alex Donnelly
